Market Review

Across the Atlantic, US Treasury yields have traded at a tighter range over April following the large moves in March. Risk sentiment remains skittish amid fears of a tightening in US regional bank lending. Key US data prints have been mixed. Inflation and wage data remain reflective of sticky inflation while the US labour market remains tight. The US Treasury 10-year yield ended the month at 3.4%, 4bps below the prior month. The US Treasury 2-year yield was mostly flat at 4% as of end April, around the same level as a month earlier.

The rally in bonds was also evident in the Asian credit market, which advanced in April, according to the JP Morgan Asian Credit indices. The investment grade sector gained and outperformed the high yield sector. Both sectors benefitted from US duration gains. In contrast, the relative outperformance was driven by tighter spreads in investment grade and wider spreads in the high yield market. From a sector standpoint, Chinese property bonds were the worst performer and fell, reversing some of the earlier gains made after the government announced easing COVID-19 restrictions in November. Otherwise, the rest of the sectors delivered gains, led by the metal and mining, consumer, as well as the oil and gas sectors. Among countries, China, Singapore, and Korea were among the laggards, while Mongolia, Thailand, India, and Macau led the gains.

Investment Strategy

The beginning of the year has been more positive for the global economy than many had feared, with first-quarter GDP reports validating this view. The resurgence of China's economy has also contributed to the strong growth in Q1 2023. Consumption spending, service sector and construction activities continued to recover, amid an ongoing post-COVID demand bounce and front-loading of policy support. Looking ahead, we believe that the risk of an early policy exit in China is low, based on our readings of the recent Politburo meeting. As a result, we expect policy support and economic recovery to continue in the current quarter.

China's pro-growth policy stance should have positive spillover effects for the rest of the Asian region, supporting continued economic expansion and providing new opportunities for investors. Elsewhere, we believe the banking sector in Asia is relatively well-placed and less vulnerable than its DM peers. Asian banks tend to have more traditional balance sheets, focusing on plain vanilla lending and fee income. Many regional banks also have good access to cheap onshore funding due to the implicit support from government ownership. Asian banks have strong liquidity positions and capital buffers due to stringent regulations and a sticky customer deposit base, which mitigates financial stability risks and ensures they are well-positioned to weather potential storms in the global economy.

Our portfolio strategy maintains a favourable medium-term outlook on duration, given the rising downside risks to growth and inflation, and anticipated end of the US rate hike cycle. However, in the short term, US Treasuries may appear overbought due to the flight to quality stemming from banking sector stress and potential credit tightening. Therefore, we plan to take advantage of any back-up in bond yields to extend duration, anticipating our positive medium-term duration view. Broadly, we favour investment-grade exposure but maintain selective allocation in the high yield sector. Within the investment grade sector, the overweight continues to be in the BBB-rated segment. For the high yield sectors, we favour Macau gaming and renewables, while being taking a credit selective approach to Chinese property credits.
